Treatment: General, Review (G)

Abstract: Online clubs in the form of small, standalone bulletin boards began to appear soon after the appearance of microcomputers and modems. Small, independent bulletin boards operated by hobbyists now number in the thousands. Larger, more complex user groups first evolved on CompuServe, where they too developed through the initiative of their members. Early CompuServe subscribers would post public domain software in public sections of the service, where others could download it. These casual groups were formalized as Special Interest Groups (SIGs-now called Forums), with their own location and software for storing and exchanging programs and messages. They have grown in numbers, size, and diversity to where they are now a mainstay of the service. The author comments on this online club scene: the design of an online club; the value of their software archives; the use of message boards and their conferencing facilities. (0 Refs)

Abstract: Discusses ways in which computer simulation can be used to determine optimum health club membership size, which is the maximum membership not causing overcrowding. In addition to identifying when clubs become overcrowded, simulation can also be used to indicate what fees should be charged and how best to expand existing memberships. It is sufficient and straightforward to interpret a health club as a closed queuing network in order to approach these topics. Data collected at a health club is used in the construction of a GPSS simulation of user traffic. The results of simulation are compared with those of the central server analytic model developed for the field of computer performance evaluation. When two simplifying but strictly false assumptions are incorporated, it is found that the central server model approximates simulated results within twenty percent under moderately crowded conditions, and the agreement is much closer as conditions become more crowded. Analysis is preferred over simulation because it is faster and less expensive to reach desired conclusions when they can be reached by analysis. However, it is less flexible and in important situations yields less accurate results due to the false simplifying assumptions needed to carry out the analysis. (19 Refs)

On-line sales strategies take travel firms into a new era

UK: TRAVEL FIRMS MOVE TO THE INTERNET

Wall Street Journal Europe (WSJ) 07 Sep 1998 Convergence - Autumn 1998 p.26

Language: ENGLISH

The travel industry is expected to be one of the first sectors to undergo a transformation by adopting the Internet as a sales and marketing tool. Internet-based services give consumers far greater control over their choice of destination, holiday operator, availability and price. In particular, consumers will benefit from the gaining access to the Galileo booking system used by around 85% of travel agents in the UK. Access will be through On - line Travel Club (OTC) of London from January 1999, for an annual membership fee of GBT 45. OTC will launch the service with a range of promotions, including discounted travel insurance, a credit card and perhaps air miles. Airlines have already set up Internet sites as an additional distribution channel to prepare for the move away from traditional travel agents. Meanwhile, the agencies are fighting back by improving customer service and improving their prices.

Disney Interactive has combined the company's pay-service Blast Online site into the free Disney.com site in a move that experts are hailing as necessary to reduce Disney's overhead. It retains a premium-pay portion of the site that will generate a good revenue stream. Members will now be called Club Blast members and will have access to 80 percent free content throughout the site. All of Blast Online's proprietary client technology was left behind after the merging of Blast and Disney.com, though many new features, such as instant messaging software and multimedia e-mail software Disney calls 'D-Mail,' greet users at the new Disney.com. The move is part of Disney's overall strategy to create an online community that does not rely entirely on subscription fees or advertising banners. The Disney.com site has also been largely redesigned to offer 12 channels.

ABSTRACT

PURPOSE: To achieve by means of ID cards various managements relating to persons and groups belonging to various organizations such as membership clubs and firms.

CONSTITUTION: An ID card having two information recording parts is made by a first data-processing system. On the other hand, by using a second data-processing system installed in other place apart from the first data-processing system, data recorded in the ID card for use in the place where this second data-processing system is installed is read to make a management file. Then, only the data recorded in one of the information-recording parts of the ID card is read, thereby achieving various managements relating to ID card users. This is most desirable as a data management system for use in a firm having sales branches all over a country, and a factory, a factory shop-floor, and etc., in mountainous areas, and for use in a chain organization comprised of small retail shops, that is, the places where the installation of a large data-processing system is impossible
